What is family support counselling?

Family support counselling can help when coming to terms with the changes a life limiting illness brings and the difficulties this involves.

- The work may involve informal contact with the family all together
- One-to-one work with the parent
- One-to-one work with the child
- Play or art sessions with the young person
- Support can be tailored to the individual family's need

Often it can be difficult to talk to those closest to you, sharing these experiences and feelings with someone outside of your immediate family can prove helpful.

Children & Grief

Just like adults children react to the Changes that happen in a family when a family member is very ill or dies.

Sometimes these changes cause children to feel vulnerable and unstable and these worries can cause anxiety and upset, even in very young children.

These anxieties may show in a behaviour change, regression, mood alterations, outbursts of anger or a change in their eating and sleeping habits, to name but a few.

Even though a child may not know the full extent of the disease progression this does not mean that they remain oblivious to the subtle changes occurring in the family.

Bite size chunks of age appropriate information can help a child not feel excluded by those closest and this will help them begin to process their feelings of grief and loss in a more manageable way.

What do we offer?

We offer short-term counselling (up to 8 sessions) to children 18 and under whose parent or close family member is being supported by St Benedict's Hospice.

Support can be accessed within the Hospice or at a suitable community venue.

Confidentiality

All aspects of your counselling are treated with confidentiality.

An exception to this occurs when we have reason for thinking that there is a risk of serious harm either to you or to another person, including children.

We are committed to equality of access to our services and undertake not to discriminate against anyone for any reason.
